Texas woman claims TSA forced nipple ring removal

LOS ANGELES — A Texas woman who claims she was forced to remove a nipple ring with pliers in order to board an airplane called Thursday for an apology by federal security agents and a civil rights investigation.

"I wouldn't wish this experience upon anyone," Mandi Hamlin, 37, said at a news conference. "My experience with TSA was a nightmare I had to endure. No one deserves to be treated this way.

Hamlin said she was trying to board a flight from Lubbock to Dallas on Feb. 24 when she was scanned by a Security Administration agent after passing through a larger metal detector without problems.

The female TSA agent used a handheld detector that beeped when it passed in front of Hamlin's chest, the resident said.

Hamlin said she told the woman that she was wearing nipple piercings. The female agent then called over one of whom said she would have to remove the body piercings, Hamlin claimed.

Hamlin said she could not remove them and asked if she could instead display her pierced breasts in private. But several other male officers told her she could not board her flight until the jewelry was removed.

She was taken behind a curtain and managed to remove one bar-shaped nipple piercing but had trouble with the other.

"Still crying, she informed the TSA officer that she could not remove it without the help of pliers, and the her," said Hamlin's attorney, Gloria Allred, reading from a letter she sent Thursday to the director of the 1

TSA Rights and Liberties. Allred is a well-known Los Angeles lawyer who often represents high-profile claims.

Hamlin showed reporters at the news conference how she took off the second ring by applying pliers to a mannequin that had a peach-colored bra with the rings on it.

She said she heard male TSA agents snickering as she took out the ring. She was scanned again and was even though she still was wearing a belly button ring.

"After nipple rings are inserted, the skin can often heal around the piercing, and the rings can be extremely difficult to remove," Allred said in the letter.

TSA officials said they are investigating Hamlin's allegations to see if its policies were followed.
"Our security officers are well-trained to screen individuals with body piercings in sensitive areas with digital imaging to ensure a high level of security," the agency said in a statement.

On its Web site, the TSA warns that passengers "may be additionally screened because of hidden items such as jewelry which alarmed the metal detector."

"If you are selected for additional screening, you may ask to remove your body piercing in private as an alternative to a pat-down search," the site says.

Hamlin would have accepted a "pat-down" had it been offered, Allred said.

If an alarm does sound, "until that is resolved, we're not going to let them go through the checkpoint, no wearing or where they're wearing it," said TSA spokesman Dwayne Baird in Salt Lake City.

People routinely pass through security wearing wedding rings without problems and it might take a larger ring to trigger an alarm, Baird said.

Hamlin filed a complaint but the TSA's customer service manager at the Lubbock airport concluded the screening was handled properly, Allred said.

Hamlin wants an apology from the TSA and an investigation by the agency's civil rights office.

Allred said she might consider legal action if the TSA does not apologize.

Hamlin was publicly humiliated and has "undergone an enormous amount of physical pain to have the nipple piercing removed because of scar tissue," Allred said.

Hamlin said her piercings have never set off an airport metal detector. She added that she will never fly again.

"The conduct of TSA was cruel and unnecessary," Allred wrote. "The last time that I checked a nipple was not a weapon."

Rosa: Good for you, dear.

What may be decoration or toys to you or me, might be a WEAPON or a PART OF A WEAPON to others. These folks doing their jobs. We might not like it, but they are trying to protect us from bad people. And what do they get the "You can't do that to me or I will sue you" mentality. And who backs the scanners? Your guess is mine.

They are trained to be suspicious of many items that, in our minds, are not weapons. We do need to remember are bad people out there that would like to hurt us. And they look like you and me. These scanners are our flight sky. If that stuff is not allowed..."Leave that stuff at home!" Stop making these peoples jobs tougher than do you feel, when somebody thinks they know your job better than you, yet they don't know what you do??

What somebody does to their own body is their business...unless they choose to share that with others. She don't...whether it be directly or indirectly, when she brought that through a metal detector. She brought it to staff. They did what they were supposed to do. These folks are just trying to do their jobs. Make their jobs easier.

My comment was directed towards her taking those things with her on a plane and not just having them. Oh, before I forget. You assume that piercing bother me. They don't. And if you want to share more about your knowledge and I will send you my email address.

The chick should have told them that they were permanent prosthetic devices and as such were not removable...demanded a pat down or body inspection as that is her right. If she was denied that, then she has the right to command of TSA at the airport. NOBODY can make you remove nipple rings against your will and they are not asking you about whether they are removable or not.

"Leave that stuff at home"? It's not bothering you! I have both nipples pierced, and a piercing below the belt which JohnnyQ, men like you may complain in public, but you sure don't in private. You need to grow up and bothering you - (as piercings BENEATH her clothes obviously aren't, then it doesn't concern you.)

If that is their policy, it's their policy. As for the 37 yo. Stop being a ti%^%y baby. Leave that stuff at home.

The more silly things that we do, the more law (or rules) that they make. Thus, we have fewer freedoms.

What did DDH say y'all? You don't have to use his words, but a summary of his alleged abuse might be enlightening.

Or just plain funny : )
